The UK range is flavoured instant lattes, Irish cream, toffee nut and similar, the sweet convenience end of hot drinks. Browse the stocked range on the Mokate shop page. It is a coffee adjacent proposition rather than tea.

What Mokate is, and the Loyd connection

Mokate is a substantial mid-market Polish and Central European hot-drinks group, founded in 1900 in Ustrón and run for four generations by the Mokrysz family, operating across coffee, instant-latte sachets, cappuccino and chocolate. The fact British shoppers most need is the tea one: it is the group behind Loyd, one of the largest tea brands in Eastern Europe, acquired in the early 2000s to balance the coffee-and-sachet portfolio. That shared ownership is why Mokate cappuccino sachets and Loyd tea bags often appear together in the same offer-led supermarket aisles, at a similar mid-market price, off the same group supply chain.

What is in a sachet, and how to make it well

On the UK shelf Mokate is mostly single-serve instant-latte sachets in flavour stacks (vanilla, caramel, hazelnut, marshmallow, mocha). Each is a powdered base of instant coffee, dried milk solids, sugar (usually over half the powder weight) and flavourings, so the cup is a sweet, milky, coffee-flavoured comfort drink rather than a brewed coffee or a real café latte. To make it well, use just-off-the-boil water, not boiling (which can scald the milk powder), whisk a splash into a paste with the powder first, then top up and stir. Where it does not fit: it is not a café latte and not a tea moment, so judge it as the convenience cup it is. For the caffeine context against tea, see the caffeine guide.

Who it is for

Mokate is for the drinker who wants a quick, sweet, flavoured latte with no equipment, in a hotel room, an office, or as a comfort cup at home. The clear place to put it on your mental map is alongside Maxwell House cappuccino and Cadbury hot-chocolate sachets rather than Lavazza or Illy. It is also the corporate parent worth knowing when you read the Loyd story, and sits among the convenience brands in the brands hub.

Reduced to one paragraph: Mokate is a mid-market Polish hot-drinks group best known for instant-latte sachets and as the parent of Loyd tea. It offers a value-oriented sweet-drink experience that suits a hotel-room, office or quick-comfort context rather than a café-grade coffee or a careful tea moment, so read it as a useful comfort product within its category, not a premium purchase. On sustainability it is mid-market: certifications vary by line, so check the individual pack, though most core Loyd tea lines carry Rainforest Alliance. Buy Mokate from the Mokate brand page, or browse the wider tea shop.
