The short answer

Milk slightly blunts the availability of some tea polyphenols but does not switch tea benefits off, and it has little meaningful effect on caffeine. The effect is real but small and often overstated.

The antioxidant point

Milk proteins bind some tea polyphenols, which can modestly reduce how many are readily absorbed. Studies are mixed and the effect is partial, not an on off switch; tea with milk still delivers polyphenols, just somewhat fewer available, see milk and antioxidants.

Keep it in proportion

The realistic difference is small against everyday diet and the amount of tea people drink. If you love milky tea, the sensible move is to drink it, not to force yourself onto a cup you dislike for a marginal gain.

Caffeine is barely affected

Milk does not meaningfully neutralise caffeine. It may very slightly slow absorption with the food in it, but tea with milk still caffeinates you essentially as expected, see the caffeine guide.

If you want maximum polyphenols

Drink it without milk, brew it properly, and have it reasonably fresh, that maximises availability, see tea without milk. Green tea without milk is the usual choice for people optimising this.

What actually matters more

Tea strength, how much you drink, and not wrecking it with sugar matter more than the milk question. Over sweetened tea is a bigger health issue than a dash of milk.

What it boils down to

Milk slightly lowers available antioxidants, barely touches caffeine, and does not stop tea working. Drink the cup you enjoy; if you are optimising, go milkless, see milk in tea or not.

Effect	With milk vs without
Caffeine alertness	Functionally identical; dose unchanged
Catechin / polyphenol availability	Slightly lower in vitro; nearly the same in vivo
Hydration	The same; tea hydrates regardless of milk
L-theanine calming	Unaffected
Heart / blood-pressure benefits	Modest, broadly similar with or without
Calories / saturated fat	Modestly higher with milk
Iron absorption from food	Tannins block iron whether milked or not

Hydration and iron, the two real notes

Two related questions are worth settling. Hydration: tea hydrates as well as the same volume of water, with or without milk, the old diuretic myth is debunked, so milk changes nothing there. Iron is the one genuine effect, and milk does not change it either way: the tannins in black, green and oolong bind non-haem (plant-source) iron in the gut, which matters if you are iron-deficient, vegetarian, vegan or pregnant. The fix is timing, not milk, drink tea between meals with an hour or two either side of an iron-rich meal, and the binding stops mattering.
