"Who invented tea" has a charming legendary answer and a clear historical one, and the gap between them is itself the lesson. This sits in the history cluster beside the history of tea.

Nobody invented it

Tea was not invented like a device; it was discovered and gradually developed as a use of a native Chinese plant over a very long period. The question itself slightly misframes how it happened: there is no single moment from "not tea" to "tea".

The Shen Nong legend

The famous story credits the mythic Chinese emperor Shen Nong, around 2737 BC, with discovering tea when leaves blew into boiling water. It is a cultural origin myth, charming and meaningful, but legend, not record.

What evidence suggests

Tea use developed in ancient China, first medicinal and culinary, later as a prepared drink, with solid documentation by the Tang dynasty when Lu Yu wrote the classic tea text, see tea in China.

Why the legend persists

Origin myths give a culture a tidy founding story; the Shen Nong tale endures because it is memorable and culturally resonant, which is exactly why honest history flags it as legend, see tea folklore.

Discovery vs spread

The more answerable questions are when tea became documented culture (Tang China) and how it spread (monks to Japan, traders west), see tea in Japan and to Britain.

The answer

If pressed: ancient China developed tea; no individual invented it; Shen Nong is legend; Lu Yu codified it. That is the defensible reply, see the history of tea.

Summary

Tea was discovered and developed in China over millennia, not invented by anyone; the emperor story is myth, the Tang era record is history, see the timeline.

Shen Nong is the dominant Chinese myth, but not the only one. Buddhist tradition credits Bodhidharma, the monk who founded Chan/Zen: frustrated at falling asleep in meditation, he is said to have cut off his eyelids, which grew into the first tea plants. A Tibetan-Mongolian tale credits a steppe nomad. None are historical; each reflects a different cultural framing, medicinal-imperial, meditative-Buddhist, nomadic-pragmatic.
