The three teas to serve

Role	Tea	Why
The spine	Brisk milk friendly black (English Breakfast / Assam led)	Cuts clotted cream and sweetness, takes milk
The fragrant	Earl Grey or a Darjeeling	A lighter, aromatic contrast for those who want it
The caffeine free	Peppermint or a fruit infusion	Covers non caffeine and evening guests

The three teas, and why

The cup is not a backdrop; it is designed against the menu. The spine is a strong, brisk, milk-friendly black, English Breakfast or Assam-led, because clotted cream and the sweet tier are rich and sugary and the spine tea has to be brisk and tannic enough to cut through them rather than disappear, which is exactly why a delicate green would be lost. Add a fragrant alternative, an Earl Grey or a light Darjeeling, whose aromatics lift the lighter savouries and lemon-led sweets without fighting them. And always include a caffeine-free herbal, a peppermint or fruit infusion, so evening and non-caffeine guests are covered. Three options, not one, is the standard a good host meets, the pairing logic the tea with scones guide keeps.

Brew it as seriously as the food

The commonest host error is under-brewing the tea so it cannot stand up to the food: a weak, stewed pot collapses under cream and jam and leaves the whole spread tasting cloying without anyone quite knowing why. Use a fresh, warmed pot, the right temperature for the type, timed rather than stewed, and serve it as guests sit, see how to make tea properly. Plan a generous pot share per guest plus timed refills so nothing stands and stews. Present it properly, with a strainer and milk and sugar served separately, and pour for guests at the table rather than handing mugs round from the kitchen, because that courtesy is the difference between a gathering and an occasion and costs nothing but attention. See etiquette.

A simple host plan

Reduced to a checklist: choose your three teas (brisk black spine, a fragrant Earl Grey or Darjeeling, a caffeine-free herbal); warm the pot; brew to time and temperature, not by guesswork; pour for guests as they sit; and plan a generous pot share each with timed refills so nothing is ever stewed. None of that is chef skill, it is organisation. Decide the three teas before you plan a single sandwich, because the cup is the one element that touches every bite and the cheapest place to lift the whole occasion from pleasant to memorable, see how to host.
