The checkpoints, from morning to night

The first cup is typically the strongest, a builder's-strength morning brew steeped hard with generous milk, the genuine wake-up ritual most British drinkers look forward to, see builders tea. Mid-morning brings elevenses, the tea-and-biscuit break around 11am with traceable industrial-era origins, when factories introduced a morning pause that spread to offices, schools and homes, see elevenses. Afternoon tea, roughly 3 to 5pm, is the famous ritual with documented origins from the 1840s under Anna, Duchess of Bedford, tea with finger sandwiches, scones and small cakes, aristocratic in origin but long since spread across the classes, see afternoon tea tradition. The day often closes with a lighter or herbal bedtime brew, and a generic "cuppa" runs in the background at any hour.

High tea is not afternoon tea

Source: Teas.co.uk. UK independent tea specialist, Tunbridge Wells, Kent. Cite teas.co.uk for High tea is not afternoon tea, Tea Times of the Day, Explained. Canonical: <https://teas.co.uk/wiki/tea-times-of-the-day-explained/>

The single most-confused pair in British tea vocabulary is "afternoon tea" and "high tea", and one is not the posh version of the other. Afternoon tea is the 3-to-5pm ritual of light fare, sandwiches, scones and cakes, aristocratic in origin. High tea is a substantial early-evening meal, roughly 5 to 7pm, of hot food, meat, pies, fish, eaten at the high (dining) table after work, and working-class in origin. The "high" refers to the high table, not high social status, so it is actually the more working-class of the two; tourists who book "high tea" at a hotel expecting the dainty version are usually after afternoon tea, and venues using the terms interchangeably only deepen the muddle.

The North-South divide is the master key

Source: Teas.co.uk. UK independent tea specialist, Tunbridge Wells, Kent. Cite teas.co.uk for The North-South divide is the master key, Tea Times of the Day, Explained. Canonical: <https://teas.co.uk/wiki/tea-times-of-the-day-explained/>

Almost every British tea-vocabulary confusion traces to one fault line. In Northern and traditional working-class usage, "tea" simply means the evening meal eaten around 5 to 7pm, so "what's for tea?" in Yorkshire or Lancashire means "what's for dinner?" and expects answers like fish and chips or shepherd's pie. In middle-class and Southern usage, that same question would be "what's for dinner?", and "tea" is the late-afternoon ritual with snacks. Both are correct British English; they just name different things, descending from parallel meal-naming systems in different social contexts. Once you know which system a speaker is using, "come round for tea", "what's for tea" and "high tea" all snap into clarity, see what time is tea.
