Term	Meaning and origin
Cuppa	Cup of tea; abbreviation of "cup of"; the most-used British tea word
Brew	A made cup of tea OR the act of making it; "fancy a brew?" universal British greeting
Char	Older slang for tea; from Chinese "cha"/Hindi "chai"; "cup of char" still affectionately used
Builder's tea	Strong standard milky tea with sugar; unpretentious default
NATO	Forces slang: "No milk, no sugar"; how someone takes their tea
Rosie Lee	Cockney rhyming slang for tea (rhymes with "tea")
Mash (the tea)	Northern: to brew tea ("I'll mash the tea")
Wet (the tea)	Variant of mash; to add water to tea leaves; to start brewing
Splash of milk	Small amount of milk; standard British tea modifier
Strong / weak	Brewing strength preference; strong = longer steep darker colour
Two sugars	Standard British sweetening level; "how many sugars" universal British question
The kettle's on	Tea will be ready shortly; British social signal

The everyday words: cuppa, brew, char

"Cuppa", the contracted "cup of (tea)", is the single most-used British tea word, and it is class-neutral, region-neutral and gender-neutral, the everyday default behind "fancy a cuppa?" and "I'll put the kettle on". "Brew" does double duty, both a made cup ("fancy a brew?") and the act of making it ("the brew is on"), and it is especially Northern, where the office "brew round" describes one person making tea for everyone, see builders tea. "Char" is older slang for tea, straight from the Chinese "cha" and the related Hindi "chai" that entered English through the tea trade; British Army usage kept it alive through the 20th century ("a brew up of char"), and it even survives in "charwoman", a cleaner historically paid partly in char-and-bread. It is dated now but still used affectionately.

How you take it, and the regional verbs

A second cluster of slang encodes how the tea is taken and made. "Builder's tea" is the strong, standard, milky-and-often-sugared default, unpretentious by design. "NATO" is Forces shorthand for "no milk, no sugar", a quick way to signal a black cup in a culture where milky is the norm, alongside everyday modifiers like "white" (with milk) and "two sugars". "Rosie Lee" is Cockney rhyming slang for tea (it rhymes), abbreviated in use to "a cup of Rosie". And the brewing itself has regional verbs: in Yorkshire, Lancashire and the North-East you "mash" or "wet" the tea, meaning to brew it, as in "I'll mash the tea" or "wet the pot before the leaf goes in", see how to make tea.

Why the slang matters

None of this is decorative. The vocabulary is functional, packing strength preference, sweetness, milk-or-not, region, class and occasion into a few efficient words, and it is living language still in everyday use rather than archive. For a visitor or a non-British speaker, knowing "fancy a brew?", "two sugars and a splash", "I'll mash the tea" and "a cup of char" is genuine cultural literacy, and it connects modern British tea-drinking to its Asian linguistic roots and its class and regional map, see British tea culture.
