

Yixing Teapot Care: Real Craft, Half the Myth

From the Teas.co.uk wiki

Yixing teapot care, in summary: The real part is simple: unglazed porous zisha clay absorbs a little tea, so you dedicate one pot to one tea family, rinse with hot water only (never soap), and let it air-dry. The miracle claims and the idea that a good pot must cost a fortune are marketing.

The Yixing teapot is the most mythologised object in tea, and the most useful fact is that its central claim is half real and half romance: a Yixing pot genuinely is unglazed, porous clay that absorbs a little of the tea brewed in it, which is why you dedicate one pot to one tea type, but the idea that it performs miracles or that any pot worth owning costs a fortune is marketing. Care follows directly from understanding the real part.

What a Yixing pot actually is

It is a teapot made from a specific unglazed stoneware clay (zisha, "purple sand") from the Yixing region of Jiangsu province in eastern China, used for unglazed teapots since at least the Ming dynasty. The local hills yield a few distinctive iron-rich clays, the common zisha, the scarcer red zhuni and the yellow-brown duanni, shaped by hand into small, relatively thick-walled pots of roughly 80 to 250ml and fired at around 1,100 to 1,200C. The result is dense but slightly porous: the pores are too small for water to leak but large enough for tea oils to penetrate very slowly, so the clay gradually takes up trace flavour and retains heat well. That porosity is the entire functional story, it is genuine, it is subtle, and it is the reason for the famous "one pot, one tea" rule.

What is real and what is mystified

It is worth splitting the two. Real, with evidence: the clay is porous and does, over much use, build a faint seasoning that can slightly round a brew; a well-made pot pours and holds heat beautifully; and handmade pots by recognised makers are skilled craft objects that can legitimately cost a great deal. Mystified, usually by marketing: that an old pot can "brew tea with no leaves", that the clay carries mystical or health properties, or that price reliably tracks magic. There is also a genuine market problem, a great deal of "Yixing" clay is not authentic zisha, and detecting fakes is hard without experience, so price is the most reliable signal (a pot under about £30 is almost certainly not authentic) followed by weight, since real Yixing feels denser than ordinary ceramic of the same size. The sensible stance is to value the real porosity and craftsmanship and discount the legend and the dubious provenance.

Why you dedicate one pot to one tea

This is the one rule that genuinely matters, and it follows logically from the porosity: because the clay absorbs flavour, a pot used for shou pu-erh will carry earthy notes into anything else, and a pot used for delicate green will be confused by a roasted oolong. So a Yixing pot is committed to a single tea type, or a closely related family, which is more flexible than it sounds, a pot that has held several Wuyi rock oolongs over its life is fine, but one used for both pu-erh and a rose-scented green would acquire muddled character. This is not snobbery; it is the direct consequence of the one real property. If you want a single pot for everything, unglazed clay is the wrong tool, and a glazed pot or a gaiwan is the better choice, a point sellers rarely make.

How to season and care for it

The routine is far simpler than the rituals sold alongside it. To season a new pot, rinse it with boiling water several times, then brew the chosen tea directly in it and pour away the first few infusions before you start drinking; an older tradition simmers the pot in water and then in strong tea, which gives a slightly deeper initial seasoning, but neither is essential. In daily use, rinse with hot water only, never with soap or detergent, which the porous clay absorbs and which then taints every future brew; the tea stains inside are the patina, not dirt. Leave the pot to air-dry fully, upside down with the lid off on a clean cloth, so it does not turn musty, and store it somewhere dry and well-ventilated, away from strong kitchen smells the clay would absorb. Consistent use with one tea is the only "seasoning" that genuinely matters.

Is it worth it?

For whole-leaf enthusiasts who already drink oolong, pu-erh or other Chinese teas gongfu style, a genuine Yixing pot is a lovely, heat-retaining vessel with a real if subtle effect, and a respectable handmade pot will outlast you. For a casual drinker it is unnecessary: a good glazed teapot or a gaiwan does most of the same job, costs far less and is easier to clean. At the high end there is a serious collector market with real craftsmanship and provenance, worth engaging only once you understand what and from whom you are buying. The practical advice is to buy a modest, genuine pot over an expensive "legendary" one of dubious clay, dedicate it, keep soap away from it, and enjoy it as the modestly special tool it is rather than the magic talisman it is sold as. The Yixing seasoning guide covers the first-use process in more detail.

Question	Answer
What is it?	A small unglazed zisha clay teapot from Yixing, China, used since the Ming dynasty for whole-leaf tea.
Why unglazed?	The porous clay slowly absorbs tea oils, gently seasoning the pot; glazed pots cannot.
Do I need one?	No. A glazed teapot or gaiwan makes equally good tea; Yixing is for enthusiasts and ritual.
One pot per tea?	Yes, one tea family per pot, since the clay carries flavour between brews.
How do I clean it?	Hot water only. Never soap, detergent or scouring pads; the inside patina is wanted, not dirt.
How do I store it?	Upside down, lid off, air-dried, somewhere dry and away from strong smells.
How do I spot a fake?	Price under about £30 and a light, ceramic feel are the warning signs; real zisha is dense and heat-retentive.
