Lemon Tea Jelly

From the teas.co.uk wiki

A tea jelly is one of those quietly grown-up puddings that looks far more involved than it actually is. You brew the lemon tea strong, sweeten it, set it with a few sheets of gelatine, and let the fridge do all the work. What you get is a clear, trembling jelly with a clean citrus edge, light enough to follow a big meal without anyone groaning.

It sets in around four hours, so make it in the afternoon and forget about it until pudding. A single raspberry on each is the only dressing it needs.
