

Fox's Half Coated Milk Chocolate Cookies: what 'half' means

From the teas.co.uk wiki

Fox's Half Coated Milk Chocolate Cookies: what 'half' means, in summary: Half coated means one face, not one end: each thick, crumbly chunk cookie sits on a smooth milk chocolate base. It is chocolate in every bite, so give it a strong tea with milk and dunk base down, briefly.

Last reviewed by the teas.co.uk team in September 2026.

Fox's puts chocolate into these cookies twice: as chunks baked through the dough and as a layer across the flat underside. Knowing which side is which decides how to hold one, how to dunk it and where to keep the pack.

Chunks on top, chocolate underneath

The published ingredient list shows the build plainly. Wheat flour leads, then milk chocolate chunks at 20% and milk chocolate at 15% for the coating, followed by sugar, palm oil, oatmeal, invert sugar syrup, desiccated coconut and a little molasses. The oatmeal and coconut explain why the cookie has a crumbly, textured bite rather than the even crumb of a smooth dough.

Turn one over and the two faces are different things. The top shows the baked cookie with its chunks; the base is a smooth sheet of milk chocolate. That base is the part that gives first in a warm room, softening and marking fingers, so pick them up by the edges and eat them at ordinary room temperature rather than straight from somewhere warm.

Dunking it chocolate side down

Unlike a fully sealed bar, this cookie can take a dunk, but only a short one. Hold it chocolate side down and give it two seconds at most. The coating on the underside softens first while the crumbly cookie soaks up tea fast, so any longer and half of it is lost to the mug. Think of it as a dip for the chocolate, not a soak for the biscuit.

Given its size and sweetness, one or two is a serving rather than a plateful. Keep the pack somewhere cool and dry, and sealed. Once it is open, fold the wrapper tight or move the cookies into a tin, and keep them away from the kettle, the oven and a sunny windowsill, all of which will soften that chocolate base before you get to it.

Which Fox's cookie to pick

Within the Chocolatey range this cookie has two close relations. The Milk Chocolate Cookies carry the chunks with no coated base, which keeps them tidier in a warm kitchen. The Millionaire's Chocolate Cookies bring caramel in for a richer cookie with a pudding feel. This one sits between them: a chunk cookie sitting on a milk chocolate underside, for anyone who wants extra chocolate without the caramel.

Whichever you choose, the drink should be sturdy. A generous milk chocolate cookie flattens a delicate cup, so a robust breakfast tea with milk is the natural partner, and a milky coffee works just as well. A spiced rooibos chai makes a softer alternative later in the day, the spice giving the milk chocolate something to push against.

FAQ

What does half coated mean on Fox's cookies? The flat underside of each cookie is coated in milk chocolate, while the top shows the baked cookie and its chunks. The coating covers a face, not an end.

Can you dunk Half Coated Milk Chocolate Cookies? Yes, briefly. Chocolate side down for two seconds at most; any longer and the crumbly cookie gives way.

What goes into these cookies? Per the published ingredient list, a dough of wheat flour, sugar, palm oil, oatmeal, desiccated coconut and syrups, with milk chocolate chunks at 20% and milk chocolate for the base at 15%.

How should I store an opened pack? Cool, dry and sealed, or in a tin. The chocolate base is the first thing to soften in a warm room.

How is it different from Fox's Milk Chocolate Cookies? Those have the chunks without the chocolate base; this one adds the coated underside.

Curator's note: Pick it up by the edge, dip it chocolate side down for a moment and have a strong mug ready. Two is plenty. Lee, teas.co.uk, Tunbridge Wells.
