

Nescafé Creamy Tiramisu Latte: A Pudding in a Mug

From the teas.co.uk wiki

Nescafé Creamy Tiramisu Latte: A Pudding in a Mug, in summary: A dessert-flavoured instant latte from the Dessert Edition: creamy and vanilla-toned, with a dry cocoa finish and sweetness throughout. Judge it as a pudding in a mug, not as a coffee.

Tiramisu is already a pudding flavoured with coffee, so a coffee flavoured like tiramisu runs the idea in a circle. Nothing subtle comes out of that loop, and the Dessert Edition label is a fair warning not to expect it.

What the tiramisu idea tastes like

The drink tastes of the idea of tiramisu more than of the pudding itself. The creamy, mascarpone-leaning part sits in the middle of the mug, soft and rounded with a vanilla tone. At the back comes a dry note like the cocoa dusting on top of the real thing, which stops the sweetness going flat. The coffee is there, but it sits a long way behind the dessert notes.

Sweetness is the headline rather than a side effect, and once the powder is in the mug it cannot be dialled back. If you want to choose how sweet your coffee is, the brand's unsweetened-taste cappuccino sachets do that job and this box does not. Read as a pudding, it earns its place; read as a coffee, you will spend the mug looking for the coffee.

When a dessert coffee makes sense

This is the mug for nine o'clock on a weeknight, when you fancy something sweet and have no intention of cooking for it. Seven sachets of 19.5g come in the box, one mug each, so it is a week of evening treats rather than a daily coffee. It needs only hot water from the kettle and a mug, with no machine, frother or pan involved.

Because it is sweet and creamy, it works best as the pudding course itself rather than alongside one. A plain, crisp biscuit is the most it needs beside it; anything iced or thick with milk chocolate piles sweetness on sweetness. It also makes a quick treat to hand round after a Sunday lunch, when nobody wants to wait for a proper dessert to be made.

Foam, aroma and the kettle

Much of what makes a dessert sachet convincing is aroma. The vanilla and cream notes are light and leave the mug quickly, so the drink smells most like tiramisu in its first half-minute. Use a dry mug, because damp powder clumps and holds the aroma inside the lumps. Rest the kettle for about a minute after it clicks so the water is around 90 degrees; water at a full boil can make it taste cooked.

The foam is made by the pour, not the spoon. Pour from a little height and fairly quickly so the water hits the powder with some force, then give it a single stir from the base, or leave it alone, since every extra turn of the spoon knocks the head down. For a richer mug, hot milk can replace the water, though that is a treat on top of a treat.

FAQ

Does Nescafé Creamy Tiramisu Latte taste like tiramisu? It tastes of the idea rather than the pudding: soft cream and vanilla, a cocoa-dry finish and a lot of sweetness. It is a flavoured latte, not a copy of tiramisu.

How big is each sachet? Each is 19.5g and makes one mug, seven to a box for 136.5g in total.

Is it sweet? Yes, deliberately. The Dessert Edition is built to taste like a pudding, so pick an unsweetened-taste sachet if you want control.
