Ginger is the warming spice that does almost everything, anti nausea, antioxidant, digestive, cardiovascular, blood sugar, cold and flu support. Its evidence base is the strongest of any common herbal tea ingredient. The plant has been used as food and medicine for at least 5,000 years across Indian, Chinese, Arabic, and European traditions. The cup is warming, distinctive, and consistently useful.

Ginger (Zingiber officinale) is the underground stem (rhizome) of a tropical flowering plant native to Southeast Asia. The fleshy beige coloured root is what's used medicinally, fresh, dried, candied, or powdered. The leaves and flowers aren't typically used.

Major commercial growing regions: India, China, Nigeria, Indonesia, and Nepal. India is the largest producer. Quality varies by region and growing conditions; freshness matters more than origin for everyday tea use.

Fresh root

The freshest cup. Slice thin, crush gently, infuse 7-10 minutes. Higher gingerol content than dried.

Dried (powdered or chopped)

Higher shogaol content (formed from gingerols during drying). Convenient for tea bags and shelf stable storage. Slightly more pungent.

Crystallised / candied

Slices of ginger preserved in sugar syrup, then dried. Sweeter, gentler ginger character. Good for snacking and travel.

Pickled (gari)

Japanese sushi accompaniment. Pink tinted pickled ginger. Not used for tea.

Tinctures and extracts

Concentrated ginger in alcohol or oil. Pharmaceutical tier dosing.

Capsules

Standardised ginger extract. Higher dose than tea, used for specific conditions (chronic nausea, osteoarthritis support).

How to brew ginger tea

Fresh root method

1. 1-2cm slice of fresh ginger per 200ml.
2. Crush gently or slice thin.
3. Just boiled water (~95°C).
4. Steep 7-10 minutes.
5. Strain. Add lemon, honey, fresh mint to taste.

For maximum medicinal extraction

Simmer fresh ginger in water for 10-15 minutes (instead of steeping). This converts more gingerols to shogaols and produces a stronger, more bioactive cup.

For mild ginger character

Use crystallised ginger or shorter steeps with fresh ginger. Sweet, gentler cup.
