Lapsang Souchong is the world's first black tea, produced in the Wuyi Mountains of Fujian Province, China, in the early 1600s. The defining feature: leaves dried over smouldering pinewood fires, producing a smoky bonfire aromatic that's polarising and unforgettable. One of the great Chinese specialty teas. Drinkers either love it or actively avoid it; the middle ground is rare.

The history

Lapsang Souchong was created accidentally around 1600 in the Tongmu region of the Wuyi Mountains, Fujian Province. The story (probably part legend): tea workers needed to dry their tea quickly when soldiers were approaching; they used pinewood fires for the speed; the unintended smoke flavour was preserved; the tea became distinctive.

Lapsang is generally credited as the world's first black tea, fully oxidised, then smoke dried. The technique spread; eventually black tea (without smoke) became the dominant Chinese export.

The name

"Lapsang Souchong" is the Anglicised version of the Chinese name "Zhèngshǎn Xì'ǒzhǎng" (正山小种, "small leaf from the right mountain" or "smoked smaller leaf tea from the original mountain"). The "right mountain" reference is to the Wuyi Mountains; "souchong" indicates smaller leaf grade.

How Lapsang is made

1. Tea leaves picked from Wuyi Mountain estates.
2. Withered briefly.
3. Rolled.
4. Allowed to fully oxidise (like any black tea).
5. Dried over smouldering pinewood fires (the defining smoke step).
6. Sometimes secondary smoking before packaging.

The smoke comes from real pinewood smouldering in dedicated smoke chambers. Premium Lapsang uses specific Masson pine wood; lower tier uses other pine varieties.

What it tastes like

Distinctly smoky. The aroma is the first surprise, the dry leaves smell of bonfire, leather, sometimes lapsang souchong flavoured bacon. The brewed cup carries through:

- Pine smoke. Dominant aromatic.
- Black tea body. Behind the smoke.
- Leather and tar notes. Sometimes.
- Long finish. Smoke lingers.

If you've never had Lapsang, expect to be surprised, sometimes pleasantly, sometimes not.

- Cocktails. Lapsang infused gin or whisky for smoky tea cocktails. The Penicillin cocktail (whisky, lemon, ginger, honey) sometimes uses Lapsang.

- Russian Caravan blends. Lapsang is often the smoky component of Russian Caravan style blends.

1. 1 tsp loose leaf or 1 bag per 200ml.
2. Water at full rolling boil.
3. Steep 3-5 minutes. Don't oversteep, smoke can become acrid.
4. Drink black. Milk masks the smoke; don't add unless you want a milky smoky cup.
5. Optional: drop of lemon for brightness.

30-40mg per 200ml cup. Slightly lower than typical British black tea, some caffeine is volatilised during smoke drying.

Modern Lapsang (lighter smoke)

Some modern Lapsang uses lower intensity smoke for a more accessible cup. Less polarising, more drinkable for newcomers.

"Bohea" or unsmoked Wuyi black

The same Wuyi mountain region produces unsmoked black tea (sometimes called Bohea or Wuyi Black). Very different cup, fruity, malty, no smoke.

Russian Caravan
