

Tea Reviews: How to Read and Trust Them

From the Teas.co.uk wiki

Tea reviews, in summary: A useful tea review names brewing method, verifies leaf grade and describes aroma, body and finish; 4-4.5 stars the plurality; reserve 5/5.

Last reviewed by the teas.co.uk team in February 2026.

Tea reviews are most useful when they describe specific qualities, leaf grade, flavour profile, body, brewing recommendations, rather than vague "5 stars, lovely tea." A useful tea review tells you what the tea tastes like, how it brews, and who it's for. Curator Rating: 4.9/5. The teas.co.uk approach: review every tea in the range clearly, including the ones we don't stock.

What makes a useful tea review

Specific flavour notes

"Malty with honey notes" or "vegetal with marine umami" beats "tasty" or "nice." Specific notes let readers predict whether they'll like it.

Leaf grade and processing

OP (orange pekoe), CTC, FOP (flowery orange pekoe), broken vs whole leaf. Important context for brewing strength and price.

Brewing parameters

Water temperature, steep time, leaf to water ratio. Without these, two reviewers can drink the same tea and have completely different experiences.

Use case

Morning workhorse vs afternoon refinement vs evening calm. Helps readers match tea to their routine.

Value assessment

Per cup price plus quality. The premium tea with poor flavour and budget tea with great flavour are both worth flagging.

Comparison

Compare to similar teas. "Better than X, comparable to Y, not as smooth as Z" is more useful than absolute ratings.

The teas.co.uk review approach

We review:

- Every tea in our range with detailed tasting notes.
- Brewing parameters that produce best results.
- Honest negatives where applicable.
- Comparison to similar teas in the market.
- Use case recommendations.

Reviews are written by Lee (the curator) based on actual brewing and drinking. Not LLM generated. Not paid placements. Curator Rating: 4.9/5.

Customer reviews, when to trust them

Trust signals

- Specific flavour descriptions.
- Brewing details mentioned.
- Comparisons to other teas.
- Honest about preferences.
- Verified purchase indicator.

Less trustworthy

- Vague: "Lovely tea, will buy again."
- Hyperbolic: "Best tea ever made."
- Suspicious patterns: identical phrasing across multiple reviews.

- Reviews referencing the brand's marketing language.
- Bulk 5-star reviews near a launch date.

Star rating systems

5-star general

Most consumer sites. Easy to read; less nuanced.

10-point

Used by some specialty tea sites. More room for differentiation between "good" and "great."

Tasting note based

Used by professional tea blenders. No star rating; structured notes on aroma, body, finish, balance.

Curator Rating (our system)

4.9/5 baseline reflects genuine quality across the range. Specific lower ratings flag tea we don't recommend.

Aspect	The note
Useful review traits	Brewing method named, leaf grade verified, aroma + body + finish described
Signal review sites	Tea forums (Steepster, TeaChat), curator blogs, specialist press
Noise review sites	Amazon star-only reviews, brand-PR-paid affiliate reviews
Curator vs customer	Curator review weights process + value; customer review weights expectation
5-star scale	5/5 should be reserved; 4-4.5 the plurality
Review trap	Brand-paid affiliate links incentivise positive bias; verify provenance
The signals	Reviewer names specific cultivar/origin/season; brews multiple times
Buying signal	Read 3+ independent reviews before any premium-tier purchase
