Rosehip is the dried fruit of the wild rose (Rosa canina), naturally vitamin C rich, traditionally used as a wartime British vitamin source, and one of the few herbal teas with a meaningful nutritional profile beyond polyphenols. The cup is tart sweet, fruit forward, and works beautifully cold brewed in summer.

The plant

Wild dog rose (Rosa canina) is the British hedgerow's most common rose species. After flowering in early summer, the plant produces small red orange fruits ("hips") that ripen in autumn. Rosehips are picked, dried, and used for tea, syrup, and traditional medicine.

Cultivated rose varieties also produce hips but wild rose is preferred for tea (richer flavour, higher vitamin content).

The vitamin C heritage

Rosehip became famous in Britain during WWII when imported citrus fruit was unavailable. The Ministry of Health organised volunteer rosehip picking campaigns; harvested rosehips were processed into "Rosehip Syrup" and distributed nationally as a vitamin C source. Children of the 1940s-60s grew up on Delrosa and similar rosehip syrups.

Nutritional content

Per 100g of fresh rosehip:

- Vitamin C: 400-1500mg, among the highest natural concentrations of any fruit.
- Lycopene and beta carotene: Significant.
- Vitamin K and B complex: Notable.
- Polyphenols and anthocyanins: Antioxidant load.

Drying reduces vitamin C content somewhat. Tea brewing extracts a portion. Don't drink rosehip tea expecting clinical grade vitamin C, eat actual rosehips, take a supplement, or eat citrus for serious vitamin C needs.

Tart sweet, fruit forward, slightly cranberry like. The cup is amber pink. Drinks pleasantly on its own or sweetened with honey.

The actual evidence

Vitamin C contribution (modest)

Tea brewing extracts a fraction of rosehip's vitamin C. Real but small contribution.

Joint pain / arthritis (modest)

Some clinical evidence for rosehip extract reducing osteoarthritis pain. Galactolipids appear to have antioxidant effects. Tea strength is gentler than supplement strength.

Diuretic effect (mild)

Traditional use; mild diuretic activity.

Skin (preliminary)

Rosehip oil topically has some evidence for skin support. Drinking rosehip tea has weaker direct skin evidence.

How to brew rosehip tea

1. 1 tea bag (or 1-2 tsp dried rosehip) per 200ml.
2. Just boiled water.
3. Steep 7-10 minutes, rosehip benefits from longer extraction.
4. Sweeten with honey to soften the tartness.

Common rosehip blends

- Rosehip + hibiscus. Tart fruit double; vivid colour. More on hibiscus.
- Rosehip + apple. Sweet fruity, child friendly.
- Rosehip + raspberry. Berry forward.
- Rosehip + nettle. Spring tonic style blend.
- Rosehip + elderberry. Cold and flu support blend.

Rosehip syrup tradition

Beyond tea, the British rosehip syrup tradition continues:

- Delrosa Rosehip Syrup. Iconic British brand; concentrated vitamin C source.
- Homemade rosehip syrup. Foraged hips + sugar + water; preserved.

Syrup contains more concentrated vitamin C than tea strength brewing.

Foraging UK rosehips

Wild rosehips are easy to forage:

1. Pick after first frost (autumn), frost softens hips and concentrates sugars.
2. Choose unsprayed sites, hedgerows, woodland edges.
3. Wear gloves (rose thorns).
4. Remove the irritant hairs inside (use blender + sieve, or split and clean by hand).
5. Dry on tray for tea storage; use fresh for syrup.
